On President Haven's resignation in 1869, Prof. Henry S. Frieze became acting president for two years. During his administration women were first admitted as students to the University and in the first year thirty-four women took advantage of this privilege.

On August 1, 1871, President James B. Angell began his administration. In 1873 University Hall was completed and in that year the legislature granted the University one twentieth of a mill tax, which annual tax remained until 1893, when it was increased to one-sixth of a mill. In 1876 a school of Homeopathy was established. In 1875 a hospital was built, part of the funds for which, were raised by the citizens of Ann Arbor. This hospital gave way in 1890 to two large hospitals built some distance from the campus, and for the erection of which Ann Arbor contributed $25,000, the balance being made up by a generous State.

A dental department was established in 1875 and its graduates soon attained high reputation. Its diploma was recognized in all parts of Europe as a guarantee of thorough, professional training.

In 1879, a large museum building was erected, since the erection of which the collections and specimens have been largely increased and many gifts have been made to it, chief among which is the gift from the Chinese government of the exhibit in the New Orleans Exposition in 1885.

A large library building was completed in 1882. It contains a semi-circular reading room with seating capacity for 210 readers, fire-proof vaults for the books, a large number of seminary rooms, and rooms for the art collection of the University. In 1884, Randolph Rogers, the famous sculptor, presented the University with a complete collection of casts and models of his work valued at over $200,000; about the same time Henry C. Lewis of Coldwater bequeathed to the University a valuable collection of about 700 paintings and 35 pieces of statuary. Many other gifts have since been made to the library and art gallery.

A large gymnasium has just been built, a gift of private individuals to the State. It is called "The Waterman Gymnasium" after Mr. Waterman of Detroit who contributed $20,000 toward its erection.

The main building known as University Hall was erected in 1871. Beside the buildings already named, during President Angell's administration a scientific laboratory, a physical and hygienic laboratory and engineering laboratory, and anatomical laboratory and two boiler houses have been erected. The law building has been very greatly enlarged. The faculty has been
